character occurred last evening at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Jenson, in Fulton, when Mr. Charles Johnson and Miss. Louise Ericson were married by Rev. Mr. Morehead, of the First English Lutheran church.

The contracting couple are natives of Sweden, and cannot speak a single English sentence. The minister pronounced them solemnly man and wife, and though neither the bride nor the groom understood a single word uttered by the divine they seemed satisfied that they were rightly married when the minister ceased to utter unknown sounds and extended his hand in congratulation.

The ceremony was witnessed by only natives of Sweden, and they were alled to understand but little more of what the minister was saying than the happy couple. A slight confusion was occasioned when the time come for the order and groom to "xy" yes," but they soon caught on to what was wanted from the gestures of the minister, and gave their session of the flow offer. There is a strange gleam in the woman's easily one or two of the old masters have succeeded in catching and limparting to the faces of their Madonnas, but only one or two.

minder believe that—that I had changed my mind."

The man pauses. He is not glib of speech, though quick enough at sea. As he takes up the little tea-pot and shakes it roundwise, after the manner of the galley, his great brown hands shake, too.

"I would not have come back here," he goes on, after a silence, "but the Maliard was ordered to the Tyne. And a chap must do his duty by his shipmates and his owners. And I thought it would be safe—after eleven years. When I saw the old place, and smelled the smell of the cld weman's frying-pan, I could not get past the door. But I hung around, looking to make sure there were no bairns raying on the floor. I have only come in, less, to pass the time of day, and to tell you ye're a free woman.

He is not looking at her. He seems to find that difficult. So he does not see the queer little smine—rather sadder, in itself, than tears.

"And you stayed away eleven years—because o' that," says the woman, slowly, "Ay, you know, lass. I'm no great hand at the preaching and Bibles and the like; but it seems pretty clear that them who's working things aid not think it fit that we should marry. And so it was sent. I got to think it so in time—least, I think lit's that sometimes. And no woman would like to say. "That's my man—him with only half a face." So I just stayed away."
